Category: Video games developed in DenmarkQ: C++ "Try to typecast pointer that does not match the template type" I have a template class whose base type is a pointer. The user is expected to pass a pointer to the derived type. However I get a "try to typecast pointer that does not match the template type" error. Here's my code:

template class A { int m_val; public: A():m_val(0) { } void update(T* p) { m_val=(T)p; } int getVal() { return m_val; } }; template class B: public A { int m_val; public: B():A() { } void update(T* p) { m_val=(T)p; } int getVal() { return m_val; } }; template void foo(T* p) { A a; B b; a.update(p); b.update(p); printf("%d ",a.getVal()); printf("%d ",b.getVal()); } void fooT(int* p) { foo(p); } int main() { int val=5; fooT(&val); printf("%d ",val); return 0; }

 And here's the error: In function 'void foo(int*)': fooT(int*): try to convert from 'int' to 'int*' without a conversion function In function 'int main()': main(): try to convert from 'int' to 'int*' without a conversion function A: You cannot pass an int* to a function expecting an int*. That

He runs into half-an-hour of the game, opening up the host and playing for a good forty minutes before he decides that he just can't be bothered. That half-hour is fairly entertaining, but the game is deliberately short and easy and you'd be better off reading a blog post about it than you would playing it...
