We have previously reported that the highly-charged polycation, poly-L-lysine, induces formation of a stable complex between calmodulin and its specific antibody [C.Y.M. Li, B. H. Chang, H. C. Wu, S.Y. Lee, J.M. Lin, Proc. Natl. Acad. Sci. USA. 96 (1999) 13998-14001]. To examine the molecular mechanism of the complex formation, we have prepared a cysteine mutant, Cys195Ala, of calmodulin and have studied the effect of the mutation on the conformational stability of calmodulin and its interaction with calmodulin-binding peptides. The mutant protein has the same Ca2+-binding properties as the wild-type protein but cannot be converted to the native form at higher temperatures. Surprisingly, the mutant protein forms a stable complex with a specific antibody in a similar manner as the wild-type protein. The results suggest that the interaction between the mutant protein and the antibody is largely independent of the sequence of the peptide ligand and that the mutation has no effect on the induced conformation of calmodulin.Q: How to separate contents of an array into a subarray based on the values in one of the array Given an array of objects as shown below, let object = [{
