Beto O'Rourke is among a growing list of Democratic candidates who have suspended their campaigns after losses in the first two nominating contests. | AP Photo/Patrick Semansky People who were once on the bubble in 2020 now have to make a decision BETO O'ROURKE is on the bubble, and he knows it. His big push to win Texas on Tuesday nearly came up short and now his presidential campaign is in flux, sources tell POLITICO, even as he aggressively tries to stay in the race. The former Texas congressman has been telling friends that he is confident he can compete in Texas' March 3 primary, which makes him all the more surprised that he came up about half a percentage point short of qualifying for the next round of debates on March 10. O'Rourke has always been a large underdog in Texas. The state hasn't voted for a Democrat since 1992, and O'Rourke's most recent race in the state saw him lose by 20 percentage points to Republican Sen. Ted Cruz, who was running for reelection. But he nearly erased that deficit this week, gaining back some support among Democrats and independents and pushing his total up to 6 percent in Real Clear Politics' national polling average. But O'Rourke needs to make it to the debates in order to reach the polling threshold and qualify to go on stage with the other presidential contenders. According to a source familiar with the campaign, O'Rourke is now aware that he will need to make a decision in the next 24 hours if he wants to make it on to the debate stage. If he drops out and his name is excluded from the third debate, he will forfeit the nearly $2 million he's raised in the last four months. O'Rourke has also spent $2 million on a TV ad buy that will no longer air on Thursday, according to two sources. The candidate's aides say he will have spent at least $12 million on his presidential bid. On Wednesday, O'Rourke spokesman Chris Evans said the campaign was in "prayer" about the decision, adding that "we look forward to putting our campaign to bed at some point in the near future, but right now the focus is on Texas, and the work ahead." "In the spirit of that, we will continue to reach out 2d92ce491b
