1975 – Max Is Gonna' – [Max Is Gonna].Efficiency of OVCAR-3 cells transfected with vector-expressing human p53 genes on chemical carcinogenesis induced by methylnitrosourea. The p53 tumor suppressor gene is often mutated in human cancers, leading to loss of its activity. In this study, a p53 gene expression vector was transferred into the OVCAR-3 cells by transfection, and the transfected OVCAR-3 cells (pCDH-p53 OVCAR-3) were studied for sensitivity to chemically induced mouse mammary carcinogenesis. On the basis of numbers of animals needed for reproducible tumor induction, the growth inhibition by pCDH-p53

OVCAR-3 cells was higher than that by OVCAR-3 cells. Histologically, there was no difference between tumors induced by pCDH-p53 OVCAR-3 cells and those induced by OVCAR-3 cells. At the cellular level, p53 protein was expressed in pCDH-p53 OVCAR-3 cells but not in OVCAR-3 cells. These results suggested that p53 gene expression by transfection might induce the growth inhibition of cancer cells.Q: Are all observable properties overridden in the base class or is it the observable property's own overridden? I have a class that has an observable property. I want to implement a "setter" so I can notify consumers of the change.

Should I override the setter in the base class (A) or create a separate setter for each property (B)? A) public A { public event Action MyEvent; public void MyMethod() { MyEvent(); } public void MyPropertyChanged()

{ //some notification code } } B) public A { public A() { this.MyPropertyChanged(); } public

A(IPropertyChangedNotifier propertyChangedNotifier) { this.MyPropertyChanged =
