Non-invasive positive pressure ventilation (NPPV) has been increasingly used for the treatment of chronic hypoxaemic conditions such as sleep-disordered breathing (SDB), chronic obstructive pulmonary disease (COPD) and heart failure. It may be used to prevent or reverse the acute effects of COPD exacerbations or respiratory failure. The use of NPPV is not without risk, but with appropriate patient selection, good technical skill and careful monitoring, the risks can be minimized. Several recent studies have demonstrated good clinical outcomes in patients with COPD and heart failure using NPPV. The potential for home NPPV to contribute significantly to improved patient care and outcomes has therefore been suggested. This review explores the use of NPPV in patients with obstructive lung disease, the evidence for its use in a home setting, and the potential benefits and risks of this therapy.Efficacy of a short-term course of probiotics and prebiotics in children with constipation: a randomized controlled clinical trial.
