after 7 years in his career. Pathophysiological aspects of peripheral vascular disease. Coronary artery disease, cerebrovascular disease, and peripheral vascular disease (PVD) are the most common causes of morbidity and mortality in industrialized countries. Cardiovascular diseases remain the leading cause of death in developed countries, and an estimated 7.5 million people in the United States die each year as a result of cardiovascular disease. Clinicians must be skilled in the diagnosis and treatment of these disorders. The management of patients with PVD is aimed at improving symptoms, maintaining mobility, and reducing the risk of a lower-limb amputation. As the clinical manifestations of PVD are varied, its diagnosis is often delayed. It is suggested that atherosclerosis, thromboembolism, and the atheromatous emboli of PVD are two separate disorders with similar clinical manifestations. Atherosclerosis appears to be the primary cause of PVD, whereas hypercoagulability and thromboembolism are more likely to play a role in the pathogenesis of PVD in patients with known atherosclerosis.
