In previous work, the LDR radiation effect on the retina, blood vessels, and other nearby tissues was shown to be biologically equivalent to that produced by much higher dose rates. However, to our knowledge, the effects of LDR radiation on the lens have not been examined. Because the lens is similar to the retina in its response to LDR radiation, it is expected that an accurate model of LDR radiation effects on the lens, if developed, could be used to predict the effects of LDR irradiation of the retina. The present study was designed to determine the effects of LDR radiation on the size and structure of the crystalline lens in an experimental system. Sprague-Dawley rats were irradiated at a dose rate of 0.01 Gy/minute with an electron beam of 10 KV. The experimental group received an acute dose of 0.35 Gy, while the control group received sham irradiation. The lenses were examined at varying time points up to 10 months after treatment. Densitometric measurements were used to determine the percentage change of lens weight, equatorial diameter, and anterior-posterior and superior-inferior dimensions. Histological analysis was performed to determine the percentage of lens area of the experimental and control groups. Finally, lattice structures were examined by transmission electron microscopy
