The order, which rescinds the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals (DACA) program, doesn't appear to have been written with political vetting in mind. While the order doesn't appear to have been written with a great deal of thought, it does appear to have been dictated to an underling. While we can argue over the specifics of what the executive order says, at its core, it effectively tells all immigrants in the country illegally to return to their home countries, and to try to get there through legal channels. While Trump has said in the past that he would not deport undocumented immigrants, he has also said that he would force them to return to their home countries. He has stated that when that happens, his administration will support the process, as it would be difficult to deport that number of people, without significant support from the countries they came from. Some see the executive order as a serious threat to American workers. The principal of a high school in Washington state has hired a lawyer to help him fight an executive order that would bar him from letting his students who are in the United States illegally attend his school, according to the Washington Post.
