How one can find all entities that have the highest Scaling Coefficient Rank values with respect to their transaction rates and sizes. It is a great example of how database is built and understand the relationships between all those elements. All you need is: - The database from previous episodes. (See episode 11) - A window of time that represents a time-frame that the database would operate within. - A background process that records the performances for that time frame. SQLTransientMemoryScaling: The main point of this episode is the approach. Because by default it is best to do every job in SQL. Specially when that job is constantly changing. Every time that an object is added, there should be a DML to add it. Every time that an object is removed, there should be a DML to remove it. If the object is reorganized, there should be another DML to add it with different name. This is because the statistics are taken at the end of the time-frame with REORG and the statistics will most likely change. When the goal is to find the most scaling object in a database, the first step is to get all the attributes that are relevant for that object and group them for a particular period. In this case, the PERIOD of interest is the previous seven days. If you choose to look at a longer period, you would get more information about that object. The reason for seven is because a year is pretty much going to have the same attributes (I chose three months to make it a little shorter but it should be more than enough). The goal here is to have those reports to be run periodically, with a new running statistic. Note: The video was recorded on the new season and the video is not as good as the 3e33713323
