Q: Understanding QWidget::acceptDrops() returns false for Qt 5.7 I have a QMainWindow widget which contains a QLabel. I'm trying to drop the QLabel onto another QMainWindow, and I'm seeing strange behavior. This works: QSize s = QApplication::desktop()->availableGeometry(label); QSize(s.width(),s.height()).moveTo(parent->availableGeometry(label)); label->setGeometry(QRect(s)); This doesn't: label->acceptDrops(); QSize(s.width(),s.height()).moveTo(parent->availableGeometry(label)); label->setGeometry(QRect(s)); I'm actually more interested in what happens when label->acceptDrops() is true or false, but it seems like it's a compiler bug. I'm trying to work around it by changing setGeometry, but I'm wondering if anyone can explain the behavior I'm seeing. I'm running Qt 5.7.1 with Qt 5.7.0 on Linux.

A: QObject::acceptDrops is a virtual function, and in general is not virtual, but if the parent class already had virtual drop actions, then the child class also has to have them, i.e. a child class cannot simply add its own virtuals in addition to the ones inherited from the parent. The documentation for the class in the docs, "A custom-type subclass can use the virtual methods inherited from the base class, and also override any other virtual methods it wishes." Instrumenting all relevant calls on or to a key in Wireshark. This is a macro that automatically follows the Wireshark usage dialog to set the desired filter. "Prefix: Key" for example would enter a filter with "Prefix: Key" as the name and "KEYMACRO" as the value. "POST: 'Key'..." would enter a filter with the name "KEYMACRO" and "POST: 'Key'...." as the value. By using this macro in conjunction with a trace directive, you can enter the filter name and parameters in an easy to remember format. The macro will take care of all the details for you. A vehicle may include a power steering system to assist a driver in steering a vehicle. The power steering system may include an assist cylinder that is actuated based on an angle of an input shaft that is operated by the driver. The power steering system may further include a tilt rod that is connected to the input shaft and moves in response to a tilt of the input shaft. The assist cylinder may generate a power assist force that is applied to the tilt rod to actuate the input shaft. The assist cylinder may be configured to include an assist cylinder body that is connected to the tilt rod, and a piston that is slidably disposed in the assist cylinder body. The assist cylinder body and the piston may be configured to define a fluid chamber that is filled with a fluid. The assist cylinder may be configured to include a relief valve disposed between the fluid chamber and the outside of the power steering system. When the piston slides to compress the fluid, the ProxyTrace is a low-level trace tool written in C++ to help developers, programmers and system administrators troubleshoot web browsing issues on the Internet. To use it, you need a pair of stub servers (the proxies) and the proxy trace tool. Usage: First start the proxy trace program on a remote machine. Note: it is recommended that you have multiple firewall ports open for incoming connections as there may be firewall issues between your network and your target machine. Fire up the proxy trace and select the HTTP server (localhost:80) This proxy trace server is capable of intercepting and logging all incoming requests (GET, POST, PUT, DELETE, etc) and the subsequent responses from a remote machine. It can also be configured to log files containing information related to the request, response, proxy server, DNS names, cookies, headers,... It would then log some HTTP messages and responses. It can intercept multiple HTTP proxies, which in this case is just the one we started on localhost:80. At this stage, we just see plain HTTP requests and responses, something you might have seen in your web browser. Fire up the web browser, and go to example.com, then click on a link (a Google search), it will then show you the corresponding request and response. The trace log of the remote server is currently set to log to file, I'll open that log file to look at the raw trace: Now we can see the HTTP messages being sent between a proxy server and a remote machine, how different this is to TCP packet trace is interesting, as you can see, the proxy is having to generate more HTTP messages than just a TCP message, I can't imagine this will change. It's also worth noting the proxy trace log has the HTTP messages complete with HTTP headers.
