I had a chance to play a few matches with HyperMotion Technology in Fifa 22 Cracked Version and here are my thoughts on how it works, how the new engine looks, and how it fits in with everything else FIFA is bringing to the game. First, though, here's a video showing the audio-visual quality of the new engine. What makes it different from other videos The trailer I just showed you does not do a great job of illustrating what "HyperMotion Technology" actually is. For that, here's an actual match from the World Cup Qualifier in Slovenia. The footage is almost certainly not the best footage you'll ever see of a match; it is done with a zooming camera, with the players running a little bit and the referee (of all people) shouting about a penalty. Still, it's a good illustration of what this engine looks like when applied to a game. How much does it cost Anybody who has tried to apply motion capture to games knows that it costs a small fortune. A single match recorded using motion capture is around $5,000 (it was around $4,000 when FIFA 19 shipped). Creating motion capture data for multiple matches often requires two people (one to do the tracking while the other to apply it in-game) and can run much more than that. It is an expensive process, so when developers make a dramatic announcement like "we're using real-life data to power our game," it must be taken seriously. But it's also fair to ask: if it costs so much, why not just use that data in the first place? Obviously, there are many reasons why you might want to add real-life data to a game. A player that looks convincing in motion capture form probably looks even better when the same player is running around in the game. Motion capture data helps create more realistic player animations. Motion capture data helps guide gameplay. It feels like cheating to have data that only exists in the real world. But FIFA doesn't need to use motion capture data to generate new animations, improve existing ones, and create new gameplay experiences. Is motion capture data required to add new gameplay options? No. For example, you could run a player in a stress test and ask them to press the "pass" button in a certain way in a reactive environment. You can do this to a
