(A: The solution below works, and is possibly the best I have seen (or at least not seen better). I also don't believe there is a way to dynamically add to the look up table, but that is not really what it is meant to do. The key is to read the file into a graph and then apply various mathematical operations to the graph (in the case of a lookup, it is a lookup). This is easy to implement, and is more elegant than a linked list as well. Also I have added numerous properties/methods to the classes used to encapsulate the logic so that all can be inherited from the same place. I will not discuss the code in great detail, as I have hidden it in a wrapper method which delegates to the precise method for the list/graph/look up/transformation that you need. So here is the class (taken from the link, but just modified for clarity) public abstract class Collection { protected List items; protected List Select(string key) { return this.Select(key, this.Items); } protected List Select(string key, List items) { List list = new List(); foreach (T item in items) { if (item.GetProperty(key)!= null) list.Add(item); } return list; } public List Add(string key, T item) { List list = this.Select d0c515b9f4

Can you guys help me? I am trying to get around my main problem. my main problem is that when I use an app, it doesn't save properly. the app is going back to the main menu after I navigate to another page. like I use netflix, which automatically enters into fullscreen mode, and I didn't realize it so I wasn't able to hit the home button to get out of it. after that was solved, the app never saved properly, so I have to constantly start it back up. I don't know how to use the keys or get it to save properly. that's the only problem I have with the app. thanks in advance for your help, Corbin . . -.- -...
