 -- Former FBI Director James Comey has written a book on his experiences as the nation's top law enforcement officer, one that promises to reveal his thoughts on current events and topics ranging from Donald Trump to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA). "A Higher Loyalty: Truth, Lies, and Leadership," which will be released by Current/Courage Press on Tuesday, is excerpted in a preview released by the publisher Wednesday. Comey is the latest former government official to write a tell-all book about his time in government after reporting earlier this year to promote his new book, "A Higher Loyalty: Truth, Lies, and Leadership." President Trump and his allies have repeatedly and inaccurately charged that Comey was fired for refusing to properly investigate former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and for being biased against Trump in the FBI's investigation into Russian interference in the 2016 election. Comey fired back in an interview on ABC's "This Week" that aired Sunday that he never felt uncomfortable with the agency's handling of the Clinton email investigation. But Comey, who helped lead the FBI's investigation into Russian interference, expresses deep reservations about recent decisions by Trump and his administration. Comey, who wrote the book's prologue, penned a paragraph describing his view of the current state of the country. "We are now in a period of great peril," Comey wrote. "We are at a dangerous time, a time when those who mean to harm America are frequenting American universities, joining American corporations, and moving ever further into the mainstream. We must take a stand to defend our country and our values, because it is the greatest country in the world." "In the end, we will look back and recognize that we had a moment, a moment in time, when America was at its best and its values at their greatest," Comey continued. "And then, in the blink of an eye, we lost our way, and the worst will start to happen — if we don't turn things around quickly." Comey refused to say whether Trump is a "liar" or a "conman." The FBI is "routinely lied to and misled by senior officials," Comey writes, "but rarely told the truth to Congress."

Q: Smart pointers in C++ issues I have a question about smart pointers in C++. I am writing a program in which I need to allocate two memory spaces; the first one should have, say, 10*10*N elements, while the second one should have 10*10*M elements. Obviously, if N > M, there will be unused space. I wrote the following code: int * M = new int [10*10*M]; int * N = new int [10*10*N]; In general, is this code incorrect? Also, I need to allocate the two memory spaces sequentially. Is this possible with smart pointers? A: Smart pointers are specifically designed for managing dynamic memory, so you don't really need them here. I think you might be confused by the fact that most smart pointers support reference semantics. So, for instance, if you create a vector of pointers to std::vector instances (i.e. std::vector), the usual assignment (vector->push_back(20);) will just "append" another int* to the end of the vector. In your case, however, you'd be creating an array of ten int* pointers, and then attempting to assign those to each point to either 10 int[] or 10 int[][] arrays. But none of that is permitted by the smart pointer. Furthermore, there is a known issue with reference semantics smart pointers, which is that pointers are treated as reference types, so for instance if you assign a vector of shared pointers, then all the shared pointers point to the same instance. As far as your overall question goes, my recommendation would be to use a std::vector for M and a std::vector> for N, and then you can freely add new int* elements to one vector and then access the elements by index. 1928 in Argentina Events in the year 1928 in Argentina.
