Note Technically, Photoshop's filter category isn't really a collection of filters; it's much more of a collection of effects. And it's not limited to just filters either. Adjustment layers also fall into this category. Filter effects are grouped into the following categories: * Color effects The Color Effects category contains 11 types of color overlay layers, including Hue/Saturation, Levels, Colorize, and Curves. It also includes the Color Balance tools and the Color Mixer. In addition, there are other controls and a number of useful effects that I discuss in depth in Chapters 4 and 5. * Highlight and Shadows effects This category includes the Spot Healing Brush and a lot of useful sketching tools. * Lighting effects This category, which includes a number of useful adjustment layers, enables you to soften and brighten images. You can use the layer masks and Light Overlay adjustment layer to make changes that you see rather than what's on

It is known to use a mobile phone for locating a person, place, or object. For example, the person may be located using GPS, and the place may be located using a triangulation-based method, such as the well-known BLUETOOTH®-based method. It is also known that a mobile phone can be used to communicate with a network of base stations, and that the location of a mobile phone can be deduced from the direction of arrival (DOA) of received network signals. It is further known that, in the context of the BLUETOOTH® standard, a device acting as a master can set up a piconet using a method referred to as Device Discovery, and a device acting as a slave can connect to the piconet on a subsequent basis. More particularly, the Device Discovery method involves the slave device receiving a list of available master devices from the master device, and for each available master device sending back a connection request message. This list includes the MAC address of the master device, and the time at which the message was received. It is known that such methods can be used for facilitating location-aware networking, and for enabling location-aware advertising or location-aware applications to run. For example, in the context of the BLUETOOTH® standard, a network operating in such a manner can be called a piconet. It is known that a mobile phone may also be used as a sensor. For example, the mobile phone can be used to detect the presence of a particular target or target in a predefined volume. It is further known that such methods may rely on modulating the "backscattering" of a radio frequency (RF) signal emanating from the mobile phone. More particularly, in the context of the BLUETOOTH® standard, such a method may be used for advertising a particular service, or for running a particular application (e.g., a location-aware application or an augmented reality application). It is further known that BLUETOOTH® is a wireless personal area network technology. BLUETOOTH® is defined by the Bluetooth Special Interest Group. It is aimed at providing a standardized, versatile, low-cost, short-range radio frequency technology that can be used for building wireless personal area networks (WPANs). In general, BLUETOOTH® provides this capability by defining a bidirectional communication protocol suite for various forms of short-range wireless
