On form below the entry for working hours is the text "Please select" and a radio button with "Choose the value and click next" If there are 2 or more products selected, it will select all of them and then the person can "click next" If there is only one value selected, it will select that only. Then the person can submit their order and so on... Everything works as it should in all browsers, but when on IE9 and IE10 there is an onload event and an onclick event attached. They both activate some scripts, code that controls the form, so the first time the user tries to submit the order (from IE9 and up), it will do all the functions correctly, however if the user clicks the button once, and then submits the order again it will not go back to the javascript function to refresh the fields... NOTE There is no submit button. There is only a "Next" button with label "Submit order" NOTE2 If anyone comes across this page too, the site is using is the following URL: EDIT: I did some digging... I think I found an answer. The problem is in the script it is following... it seems like a lot of the scripts are getting appended to the end of the page when the onclick event is triggered. So here is what happens: Page loads the usual, when onclick event is triggered on the order button, it runs the scripts to make this page behave as described above. Now, it loads a new page. The first time you click on the button, it runs the scripts to make this page behave as described # above. Now, it loads a new page. The first time you click on the button, it runs the scripts to
